Commemorating 40 Years of Prophetic Witness: Reflecting on the Legacy and Relevance of the South African Kairos Document (1985–2025)

The University of South Africa (UNISA) is honoured to host the 40th Anniversary Celebration of the South African Kairos Document (1985–2025)—a prophetic voice that challenged both church and society during the height of apartheid. More than a historical moment, this commemorative event is a theological gathering of faith leaders, theologians, activists, and scholars who continue to be shaped by the Kairos Document's enduring vision. The programme includes keynote address, panel discussions, and a call to action for the church to once again become the moral compass of our time. Esteemed voices such as Rev. Dr. Frank Chikane, Rev. Moss Nthla, Rev. Dr. Wesley Mabuza, Bishop Dr. Purity Malinga, Rev. Mzwandile Molo, and others will grace the occasion alongside UNISA leadership and critical theological thinkers.

This is not only a celebration of history—it is a call to renew the church's prophetic role in shaping a just and faithful future. As Tinyiko Maluleke (2008) asserts, the Kairos Document "pushed the boundaries of what the church was willing to say publicly," challenging both religious complicity and political injustice with bold theological critique.

The Relevance of the Kairos Document and Today's Kairos Moment

The Kairos Document of 1985 was more than a critique of apartheid—it was a courageous theological response to systemic evil that called out the silence and moral ambivalence of much of the South African church. It denounced both "State Theology" and the cautious "Church Theology," and offered instead a prophetic theology rooted in justice and solidarity with the oppressed (Maluleke, 2008; De Gruchy, 2006).

As Gerrie Lubbe (2003) notes, the document was born at a time when South Africa stood at a moral crossroads—a kairos moment—defined as a time of crisis and opportunity when moral clarity becomes imperative. The authors declared unequivocally that neutrality in such times is a sin, and that faith must lead to action. That call echoes powerfully today. We are again living through a kairos moment—marked by rising inequality, gender-based violence, xenophobia, corruption, ecological destruction, and the betrayal of democratic promises. Sarojini Nadar (2014) argues that our time demands "a new kairos theology that speaks to intersectional oppression—gender, race, class, and ecology." The prophetic church must therefore be intersectional, disruptive, and justice-oriented.

James Cochrane (1999) reminds us that prophetic witness involves resisting "respectable religion" that cushions power. Rather, the church must stand with "the crucified peoples of history," rejecting accommodation to injustice. Similarly, Musa Dube (2012) insists that theology today must be activist and transformative—calling not only for speech but also for performative justice.

The Kairos Document also left a deep imprint on biblical and theological scholarship. Gerald West (2010) notes that it fostered a contextual hermeneutic that reads the Bible in solidarity with the poor. This approach continues to inspire liberationist theology across the Global South. To remember the Kairos Document, then, is to resist the erasure of liberative memory. As Denise Ackermann (2001) has said, "To remember is to resist forgetting. To remember is to insist on justice." Thus, the 40th anniversary is not simply a historical reflection—it is a prophetic invocation.

In the words of the document itself: "The time has come. The moment of truth has arrived." This celebration calls us again to choose truth over fear, justice over neutrality, and prophetic action over silence.
